

`doGet()` parameters are in the header and it is better for performance and should be used for simple efficient requests, such as selecting from a database. For uses that require a large number of parameters or sensitive data `doPost()` is a better option since parameters are in the body and not the header, but can be less efficient.